

Contributors

Hercules Chu Kok-yin is a PhD candidate at the Sydney School of Education and Social Work at the University of Sydney. His research interests include the history of civic education and the post-WWII socio-cultural history of the Asia-Pacific. His current doctoral thesis focuses on the comparative studies of government-initiated Confucian movements in Taiwan and Singapore.

Guilherme Augusto Laidens Feistauer (賀古圖) is a BA graduate in Arts & Culture from Maastricht University. His research interests include the decolonization of historical narratives, non-deterministic histories of technology development, large-scale cooperative models, and post-Marxian economics. He is a great admirer of Peter Wesley-Smith's work.

Vincent Ho is a research associate at the Department of History, Hong Kong Baptist University. With a keen focus on the environmental history of East Asia and Southeast Asia, he is involved in a research project on the study of botany and forestry in Hong Kong.

Novem Ho Tsz-wing is a teaching assistant at the Department of History, Hong Kong Baptist University. Her research focuses on the environmental history of East Asia and Southeast Asia, and she is engaged in a research project on botany and agriculture in Hong Kong.

Charles Lam is a lecturer in the School of Languages, Cultures and Societies at the University of Leeds, United Kingdom. His research includes corpus linguistics, digital humanities, and humor studies. His publications can be found in journals such as Lingua, Studies in Chinese Linguistics, Humor, and the East Asian Journal of Popular Culture.

Charmaine H. Lam is a PhD student in the Department of History at New York University. She specializes in the British Empire and Modern China. Her research interests include women's labor migrations, colonial family formation, and gender constructions at the intersections between China and the British Empire.

Lorraine Lau is a researcher, editor, and translator with an MSt in World Literatures in English from the University of Oxford. She is interested in exploring cultural representations of Asian diasporic identities, with a focus on Hong Kong narratives.

Raymond Pai is a lecturer of Cantonese in the Department of Asian Studies at the University of British Columbia (UBC). He is also a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada-funded PhD candidate in the Department of Language and Literacy Education at UBC. His research and teaching interests include heritage language education, language ideology and learner identity, language technology and testing, and popular culture in language education.

Elaine Wisbey (韋絲貝) is a BA History and the History of Ideas graduate from the Goldsmiths and Queen Mary's Colleges of the University of London and a recent MSc Global Mental Health graduate from King's College London. Her current work stems from a belief in the necessity of cooperation, collaboration, and greater understanding between the arts and the sciences. She, too, is a great admirer of Peter Wesley-Smith's work.

Yip Ka-che is a Professor Emeritus of the University of Maryland, Baltimore County (UMBC). He has published in journals and books on the subject of the history of medicine and public health in modern and contemporary China. His current research focuses on the history of medicine and diseases in Hong Kong. He is the author of Health and National Reconstruction in Nationalist China, editor of Disease, Colonialism, and the State: Malaria in Modern East Asian History, and co-editor of Health and Disease in Colonial and Post-colonial Hong Kong and A Documentary History of Public Health in Hong Kong.